The Human Life Review, Volume XVI Number 3, Summer 1990

The Human Life Review is the only publication of its kind in the world: a journal devoted to life issues, primarily abortion (William F. Buckley once praised it as "the focus of civilized discussion of the abortion issue"), but also "neonaticide," genetic engineering, cloning, and fetal tissue experimentation, as well as the end-of-life issues of euthanasia, assisted suicide and suicide. We also publish articles dealing with more general questions of family and society: what the "abortion mentality" has done to our culture; how moral relativism has pervaded our political process as well as our educational system; and how the debates over day care and the children's rights movements, as well as the controversy over health care and end-of-life decision making, reflect a society sharply divided on the most basic moral questions. Partial contents: Changing the Odds (Hentoff).- The Baby That Wasn't (Abbott).- More Room at the Inn? (Allison).- Feminism and Abortion (Bayles).- Conservatism vs. Itself (Lasch).- What Wins My Vote (Muggeridge).- The Art of 'Listening' (Hitchcock).
