There are ethical principles within the laws of nature that can guide an individual, an organization, and a society. John Allison, former CEO of BB&T Bank and the Cato Institute, illuminates these principles, which has lead to individual success, his banks' success, and Cato's success. He draws heavily on his experiences and took BB&T from $4.5 billion in assets to over $152 billion. Most impressively, he never had a quarterly loss during the 2008 financial crisis. A stronger leader requires vision, purpose, and clearly defined actionable values. The question is what do these look like and how do we know they are true? Allison sets out to illustrate the prescience of a good leader by explaining how he built those traits in himself.
